Rua and the Maori Millennium

PETER WEBSTER
Senior Lecturer in Anthropology, Victoria University of Wellington

For most people, if the name Rua means anything at all, it will call to mind a faintly sinister Maori prophet whose millennial cult at Maungapohatu became significant as a result of the police raid of 1916. Rua and the Maori Millennium changes all that.

Dr Webster combines a deep sympathy for the Maori viewpoint (free of idealisation) with an intimate knowledge of the Tuhoe tribe and the Urewera, to present the first convincing account of Rua's emergence and development as a prophet. A genuine understanding of Te Kooti is only one of the many by-products.

The book is a major contribution to the anthropological and psychological study of millenarianism. As a case study it is especially illuminating, but it is even more important as a contribution to the evolving historical reassessment of Maori-Pakeha relations, of interest to all who want a deeper insight into how a distinctive New Zealand society was formed.

Besides which, Rua and the Maori Millennium is simply compelling reading.

A SOUTHERN GENTRY:
New Zealanders who inherited the earth

by Stevan Eldred-Grigg

A colourful and controversial look at the prosperous aristocrats who stamped their image on New Zealand life and who grew rich—while ordinary people struggled to survive.

A Southern Gentry will challenge the concept all New Zealanders have of their country—and aims to set the record straight.
