A History

by

RACHEL BARROWMAN

'One feature of good institutional history is that telling the story of a part often serves to shed light on the story of the whole . . . So it is here, with the history of Victoria University, which celebrated its centennial last year, reflecting the processes of change – social, political, economic – to which New Zealand at large was subject in the 20th century. . . . Barrowman's prose is as stylish as it is scholarly, and she exhibits a journalistic eye for the quirky and picturesque detail.'
Evening Post

The last of New Zealand's big four universities to be established, and the poorest, Victoria was a 'people's university' in more ways than one. This history of Victoria's 100 years considers what makes Wellington's university distinctive: its early claims to specialisation in law, commerce and political science; its strength in social science pioneered by professors of the 1930s and 1940s like Tommy Hunter and Ernest Beaglehole; Antarctic research; tuatara; linguistics; creative writing. And of course, the implications of living in the capital city.
