

Notes on Contributors

Elsbeth Knewstubb graduated from the University of Otago in 2008 with honours in Law and History. She became interested in histories of medicine and mental illness during her BA honours year, going on to study the social history of insanity. Her MA thesis, a case study of Ashburn Hall, a private asylum in Dunedin, was completed in 2011.

Joanne Richdale completed her PhD at the University of Auckland in 2010. She is working for the WAVES Trust as a research analyst and project coordinator supporting the Waitakere family violence sector network. Her current research focuses on nineteenth-century popular discourses about birth control, and the history of community responses to child maltreatment.

Helen Robinson has a PhD in history from the University of Auckland. She is currently working as a research analyst for the Waitangi Tribunal, and can be contacted via helenalexrobinson@yahoo.co.nz.

Jonathan West's 2009 doctoral thesis examined the environmental history of the Otago Peninsula. His other research interests include the politics of resource management and environmental ethics. He is employed at the Waitangi Tribunal and is turning his thesis into a book. Email jonathan.west.nz@gmail.com.